SECTION C: READING

G. Read the text below. For questions 15-19, choose the answer that you think fits best according to the text.

About two-thirds of the world's population lives in what is loosely called 'developing countries', which are undeniably poor. Although rich countries have only about 34% of the world's population, they earn about 90% of the world's income. They also possess about 90% of the world's financial resources and more than 80% of the world's protein - including 70% of its meat- and they eat it.

Thanks to an impressive succession of agricultural revolutions, man's food growing capacity is now hundreds of times larger than at any time in history. Nonetheless, the number of hungry and malnourished people is also larger than at any time in history. Admittedly, total food production has increased since 1961 in most parts of the world. Yet per capita, food production has little changed from the inadequate levels of the early 1960s. In short, world and regional production have barely kept up with population growth.

There appear to be five food problems. First, there is the problem of the quantity of every human being getting enough calories to provide him /her with the energy to work and progress. Second, there is that of quality- of everyone getting enough protein, vitamins, and necessary minerals. Next, there is the matter of distribution: we have to find satisfactory ways of transporting, storing, and issuing food. Then, there is the problem of poverty. Many people in developing countries do not have money to buy food in sufficient quantity and of adequate quality. And last, we must find ways of avoiding ecological side effects. In other words, we must be able to grow enough food without further degrading our land, water, and air.
